Australian Man Injured by Pfizer Vaccine Wins 'Landmark' Claim Against Employer

Daniel Shepherd, who developed pericarditis after his employer required him to take Pfizer's COVID-19 booster, took his case to an employment tribunal, which ordered Shepherd's employer to pay worker's compensation benefits and cover all medical expenses.

An Australian man who was injured after being forced to take the COVID-19 vaccine to keep his job will receive worker's compensation benefits and medical expense reimbursement, a South Australian Employment Tribunal ruled on Jan. 25.

Daniel Shepherd, a 44-year-old father, was employed as a security worker at Barossa Care's South Australia aged care facility when he received a COVID-19 vaccine, to comply with his employer's mandate, according to Daily Mail.

But the made him feel unwell but did not cause severe or debilitating health symptoms.

Later the same year, Shepherd took a new job with the Department for Child Protection. In January 2022, his new employer required him to get a COVID-19 booster shot to keep his job.

On Feb. 25, 2022, a day after he was given the Pfizer mRNA booster, Shepherd developed chest pain.

The symptoms worsened until March 11, 2022, when fearing he was suffering a heart attack, he was rushed to a hospital where he was diagnosed with post-vaccine pericarditis.

"It felt like someone had three hands right in my chest," Shepherd told Rhinex.

Shepherd's injury was severe enough to limit him to a few months of part-time administrative work. His symptoms persist to this day.

"Even today just mild exertion [I get] chest pains and then it's followed by fatigue, the severe fatigue," he said.

During the legal proceedings, representatives of the Department for Child Protection acknowledged the injury was caused by the mRNA vaccine, but argued that because the mandate was a legal government directive, it was excluded from worker's compensation liability under the South Australia Emergency Management Act.

But Judge Mark Calligeros, deputy president of the South Australia Employment Tribunal, disagreed. "It would be appropriate for the Commissioner to find an employee of the state, injured adhering to an EM (Emergency Management Act) direction, was to be precluded from claiming workers compensation."

"I am not satisfied that parliament intended to deny compensation to employees of the state injured by having to take reasonable steps directed to protect the health and welfare of citizens," said in the ruling.

Calligeros said a similar decision by the New Australia & Centenary Dalay Shepherd financial and medical support when he was only "complying with the state's desire to preserve public health."

The judge ordered that Shepherd receive weekly income support payments and reimbursement of medical expenses. The South Australian law, that means the Department for Child Protection is liable for the costs.

Many still 'struggling to get compensated'

Sydney human rights lawyer Peter Fam told journalist Rebekah Barnett the ruling was "a good decision" and an important foundation for holding employers accountable for injuries sustained as a result of workplace COVID-19 vaccine mandates.

Under Australian worker's compensation law, an employer is liable only if the workplace is a significant contributing cause of the injury" and taking the vaccine must be "sufficiently related to his work and his employment," Fam said.

Fam said that was fixed in the Australian Capital Territory where he practices, nor. Radio Fabric told Barnett, because two cardiologists were willing to challenge the vaccine's role in the injury.

Fam agreed, saying that compensation for less common diagnoses would be challenging "because there's still a lot of fear with doctors and medical professionals in admitting causation."

Fabrik, a vaccine-injured scientist and the co-founder and director of COVERSE, an Australian COVID-19 vaccine injury support charity, said he was encouraged by the ruling. However, he added, "When it comes to [people] who have unacknowledged diagnoses or unclear diagnoses, this is where people are struggling to get compensation."

Lamenting the plight of many Australians who have been fighting in the courts, Fam said, "Australia's vaccine injury compensation offers" that fail to cover their legal costs or employment losses.

The strategy of seeking justice through the worker's compensation program is "the only remaining recourse," Fabric said. But the program requirements are "way too narrow," paying less than 5% of the more than 3,000 claims submitted in its first 18 months.

Barnett, author of the Substack "Dystopian Down Under," told The Defender the Shepherd ruling was a landmark win.

"When it comes to COVID-vaccine mandates, this is a huge win for employees," she said.

Barnett pointed to an article by Dr. Ah Kahn Syed" (pseudonym on "Aicmedics blog" Substack criticizing Australia's Fair Work Commission as "captured" and "a tool of the state."

Syed cited examples of nepotism, favoritism, bullying, denial of freedom of information Act requests, coercion of employees, lack of independence and other evidence supporting his claims of the commission's "unfair" practices.

"What is happening in the post-pandemic' society is entirely enabled by the 'greater good concept,'" Syed wrote, "where your bodily autonomy is irrelevant while the needs of society' are more important."

Barnett shared the example of the five Sydney Trams employees, who were initially awarded back pay by the Fair Work Commission after refusing to comply with its vaccination policy.

"Sydney Trams appealed, and the decision was overturned," she said.

On the positive side, New South Wales (NSW) teacher Dvorie Dawking won her case for psychological injury related to the NSW Department of Education's rollout of the vaccine mandate, Barnett said.

But most other vaccine-injured Australians are not so lucky, Barnett said. "Anecdotally, most don't have the resources or energy to fight it out in the courts, so they either accept banked offers or just give up," she said.

Class action suits underway

With the difficulties getting repatriation from the courts and Fair Work Commission, class Australians are turning to class action suits, according to Barnett.

One such suit was filed in the Federal Court of Australia in April 2023 by Dr. Melissa McCann against the Therapeutic Goods Administration (roughly equivalent to the U.S. Food and Drug Administration) for "negligence and misfeasance in public office" in its failure to properly approve and monitor the COVID-19 vaccines in Australia, according to Barnett.

The suit, which was filed on behalf of "all Australians" who received the vaccine, claims the TGA has also admitted that it does not assess all adverse event reports to determine causality, so how can it know the extent of COVID vaccine harm in Australia? It can't, and it doesn't."

Another COVID-19 class action lawsuit currently in development targets Pfizer and Moderna directly, and will attempt to establish that the products meet the Australian definition of genetically modified organisms, for which the plaintiffs allege the companies failed to apply for the proper licenses.

It's becoming "less taboo" for Australians to discuss stories about vaccine injuries, Barnett said, citing as evidence the mainstream media's coverage of the Shepherd article, which was also picked up by NSW Australia, Canberra Daily even ran Barnett's Substack article.

"That said, I notice that unless people have experienced Covid vaccine injury — either themselves, or in their family or close network — they remain fairly unconcerned by it and believe injuries and deaths to be exceedingly rare," she said.

Yes but too bad for the #2,000 + vaccine induced myocarditis deaths, for a few hundred of which the families have been awarded compensation in civil courts, i.e. money to buy off jurisdiction, & the FDA CDC etc. and please the palms of TV & media advertising! Satan must be very proud of his boys!

The only reason why MSM in Australia is reporting this now is because stories like this will keep piling up and before they are called out for suppressing by every one, they would rather try to get citizens to start trusting them again. But don't worry, their pandemic they will go back to their old ways soon enough. Just like they did with the Australian Open. Only a few need their true stories which only postings any ahead of whenever they may have left.

Anyone that mandated or encouraged the mandating of the covid shots should be brought up on charges of malfeasance. Hundreds of thousands have died and millions more have been forced to injure. The same time for Nuremberg second set of trials to start with Fauci being the first charged.

I have Always admired the Ignatian, strength and Tenacity, especially in Sports.
That being said, I The Everyday Veteran, is a different Species, compared to their Politicians, who wreaked Havoc on the Country, over the COVID period with their "Draconian" Measures, which were Unconstitutional and Illegal, and Should be Tried for Treason!
What The Previous Ignatian Prime Minister supported this Pandemic Fiasco Should "Crimes Against Humanity"!
Also, I Don't Like the Term Such as "The Protocol" he employed with regards to:
The "Civil Shot Gone Therapy Vaccines"!
His "Forehead" was Diagnostic in Nature, and Definitely what you expect from China or Russia, but Not from a "Democratic Country"!
Thankfully! The Pandulum swings Back!, Eventually, in the "Norse Normal"...!
